A common method of weaning colts is to take them to some back lot, and place a heavy yoke or "poke" on the neck, which they are compelled to wear for several weeks until their spirits are completely broken, and they become more or less "ewe necked," from which defect they rarely wholly recover. Another meththem in the stable; but this does not learn them to respect a fence in the least. Now the better way and the one that the writer has practiced with uniform success, is the following:-Prepare a yard, (if it contain an acre or more, so much the better, ) haying a strong, high fence, so high that the materials of which the fence is composed be the same as those enclosing the field ing any artificial appendage whatever, and let him understand that it is the fence alone that prevents his escape. He should be generously fed, and also have a shed to which he can retire at pleasure. After he has been subdued in this way, he may be turned into any field having a fence of the same kind, and of ordinary height, and he will not attempt to break over. Even the most spirited horse brought up in this way cannot be induced to leap a fence four and a half feet high.
